I learned a lot about grandparenting this past trip to Utah. Previously we have only ever dealt with one grandchild at a time and they've been very young. On this trip we had a two and a half year old as well as a new baby to look after. Newborns require a lot of specialized care where they need held while fed, squirm around while you're trying to change them, etc. When you are caring for both alone the two year old knows by instinct when you are immobile due to handling the baby and they use that time to do things they otherwise would be prevented from doing, i.e. run to another room and squirt their applesauce all over the carpet or climb the shelves to secure valuables they're not allowed to have... I also learned not to allow the two year old to walk out of the house under his own power thinking he would head for the car because you were taking him where he wanted to go. The first time I did this I got hit with a snowball - the kid's got an amazing arm. On the first sunny day I took him to the park, he ran constantly for over an hour, when we got home I was the one that took a nap. But then there is that golden moment in the evening when he comes by and chooses to sit in your lap while you read him a story or he flashes you one of his signature smiles... May God bless and strengthen all of you full time parents and grandparents! I may run four miles a day but I'm no match for a two year old.
